Symposium

Collaboration and Digital Handover:

Discussing the Project “Nuba Images by Leni Riefenstahl”

25–26 October 2024

Kulturforum

Staatliche Museen zu Berlin
(National Museums in Berlin)

Practices concerning repatriation and collaborative provenance research have hitherto largely focused on cultural objects in museum collections. Collaborative research and the digital provision of photographic collections from colonial contexts is still in its infancy. Now, the German–Sudanese research project on Leni Riefenstahl’s Nuba photographs and film footage is exploring joint approaches towards revising these works with the aim of analysing, classifying and digitally handing over the photographic material for appropriation. The ultimate goal is to develop alternative ways of engaging with these works that incorporate various kinds of knowledge and counter hegemonic museum discourses, practices and representations.

The late German film director Leni Riefenstahl (1902–2003) became famous as a key creator of Nazi propaganda films. In the 1960s and 1970s she produced two widely distributed books of photographs of the Nuba communities in Sudan. Her Nuba photographs were charged with a colonial, racist aesthetic and attracted international attention. Although these works were subject to intense critical debate, they also acted as the catalyst for her artistic and popular comeback as a photographer. Leni Riefenstahl’s estate, which was donated to the Stiftung Preussischer Kulturbesitz (Prussian Cultural Heritage Foundation) in 2018, forms the material basis for this research project with our Nuba partners, the Pan-Nuba Council.

The interdisciplinary symposium is structured around three thematic areas: multiple photographic contexts and working with archives; collaboration, knowledge production and multiple epistemologies; and (re-)claiming heritage. The project team members will present initial findings from their ongoing research. To broaden the theoretical framework, a number of scholars have been invited to reflect on their own work and experiences in the field of digital archiving and provisioning. The aim of the symposium is to provide a platform for discussing different approaches to collaboration and digital repatriation, taking into account the challenges, the constraints and potential of these kinds of working processes. The event will bring together a wide-ranging audience of scholars and interested members of the public.
